Over the past 40 years, there has been a steady increase in female migration. Of the approximately 191 million migrants in 2005, around 95 million were female, of which an estimated 60 million were in developed countries.

Women today are migrating independently for work, though family reunification is still the main reason for female migration. An unknown but significant number of women are forced by war or civil unrest to leave their countries. Other reasons for women to migrate include unequal gender relations, gender-based violence, poverty and economic insecurity.

Expert recommendations on migration

1. Collect, analyse and make available data on female migration, including flows of migrants and cyclical migration.

2. Discuss and agree on migration issues at all cross-national levels (bilateral, sub-regional, regional and international), including with countries of transit, taking advantage of international organisations and mechanisms for the purpose; hence include:
   a. Policy frameworks to provide safety and stability to the process of migration; discourage irregular migration, and punish traffickers;
   b. Enforcement of international conventions and agreements;
   c. Free flow of labour as well as of goods and services;
   d. Skills development of female migrants;
   e. Entitlement of female migrants to housing, education, health including reproductive health and other services;
   f. Support for civil society organisations working with and on behalf of migrant women.

3. Support individual migrants:
   a. Countries of origin should provide pre-departure programmes (in co-operation with migrant organisations in destination countries) including information and training for women considering migration on:
      • Conditions in the intended countries of destination;
      • Legal migration routes and the implications of irregular migration;
      • Human rights entitlements, including rights to basic services;
      • Where to find assistance in countries of transit and destination, including consular support, Social migrant organisations and destination-country NGOs;
      • Protecting health, including reproductive health.

   b. Job opportunities in countries of destination;
   c. Destination-country language;
   d. Optimising remittances while abroad and on return. Special care is needed to combat stigma against internal returns of trafficking and abuse, and women living with HIV/AIDS;
   e. Countries of origin should ensure respect for human rights, protection for migrants in transit and prevention of coercion and trafficking;
   f. Countries of destination should ensure respect for migrant human rights, equal treatment under the law, and access to employment, housing, education, health, including reproductive health, family planning, material health, etc.;
   g. Irregular migrants should have due protection for their human rights.

4. Recognise and respond with services and information to specific gender-related issues:
   a. Enhanced risks of violence, theft and fraud;
   b. Trafficking and coercion, including forced marriage;
   c. Access to and capacity to use health and other services, including reproductive health services;
   d. Expectations related to the family;
   e. “Double burden” for migrant women (stemming from e.g. discrimination, cultural restrictions and heightened exposure to risk);
   f. Isolation by reason of language or family situation.

5. Support individual migrants:
   a. Countries of origin should provide pre-departure programmes (in co-operation with migrant organisations in destination countries) including information and training for women considering migration on:
      • Conditions in the intended countries of destination;
      • Legal migration routes and the implications of irregular migration;
      • Human rights entitlements, including rights to basic services;
      • Where to find assistance in countries of transit and destination, including consular support, Social migrant organisations and destination-country NGOs;
      • Protecting health, including reproductive health.

   b. Job opportunities in countries of destination;
   c. Destination-country language;
   d. Optimising remittances while abroad and on return. Special care is needed to combat stigma against internal returns of trafficking and abuse, and women living with HIV/AIDS;
   e. Countries of origin should ensure respect for human rights, protection for migrants in transit and prevention of coercion and trafficking;
   f. Countries of destination should ensure respect for migrant human rights, equal treatment under the law, and access to employment, housing, education, health, including reproductive health, family planning, material health, etc.;
   g. Irregular migrants should have due protection for their human rights.

6. Recognise and respond with services and information to specific gender-related issues:
   a. Enhanced risks of violence, theft and fraud;
   b. Trafficking and coercion, including forced marriage;
   c. Access to and capacity to use health and other services, including reproductive health services;
   d. Expectations related to the family;
   e. “Double burden” for migrant women (stemming from e.g. discrimination, cultural restrictions and heightened exposure to risk);
   f. Isolation by reason of language or family situation.

7. Support individual migrants:
   a. Countries of origin should provide pre-departure programmes (in co-operation with migrant organisations in destination countries) including information and training for women considering migration on:
      • Conditions in the intended countries of destination;
      • Legal migration routes and the implications of irregular migration;
      • Human rights entitlements, including rights to basic services;
      • Where to find assistance in countries of transit and destination, including consular support, Social migrant organisations and destination-country NGOs;
      • Protecting health, including reproductive health.

   b. Job opportunities in countries of destination;
   c. Destination-country language;
   d. Optimising remittances while abroad and on return. Special care is needed to combat stigma against internal returns of trafficking and abuse, and women living with HIV/AIDS;
   e. Countries of origin should ensure respect for human rights, protection for migrants in transit and prevention of coercion and trafficking;
   f. Countries of destination should ensure respect for migrant human rights, equal treatment under the law, and access to employment, housing, education, health, including reproductive health, family planning, material health, etc.;
   g. Irregular migrants should have due protection for their human rights.

8. Recognise and respond with services and information to specific gender-related issues:
   a. Enhanced risks of violence, theft and fraud;
   b. Trafficking and coercion, including forced marriage;
   c. Access to and capacity to use health and other services, including reproductive health services;
   d. Expectations related to the family;
   e. “Double burden” for migrant women (stemming from e.g. discrimination, cultural restrictions and heightened exposure to risk);
   f. Isolation by reason of language or family situation.

United Nations Population Fund
230 East 42nd Street
New York, New York 10017
www.unfpa.org

International Organization for Migration
17, Route des Morillons
CH-1211 Geneva 19 Switzerland
Tel: +41.22.717 9111 • Fax: +41.22.798 6150
122 East 42nd Street,
New York, NY 10168-1610
www.iom.int

Migration is not necessarily permanent: most refugees for example hope to return to their own countries;

Facts and Figures

More women today are migrating independently for work, though family reunification is still the main reason for female migration. An unknown but significant number of women are forced by war or civil unrest to leave their countries. Other reasons for women to migrate include unequal gender relations, gender-based violence, poverty and economic insecurity.

Data on female migration are generally inadequate. Many countries have data but fail to process or publish it in usable form. Analysis from a gender perspective is almost completely lacking.

Women on the Move

© UN/ J. Isaac / UNFPA
© P. S Sudhakaran / UNFPA
© IOM 2002 - MKZ0006
(Photo: Michael Tschanz)
Over the past 40 years, there has been a steady increase in female migration. Of the approximately 191 million migrants in 2005, around 95 million were female, of which an estimated 60 million were in developed countries.

Data on female migration are generally inadequate. Many countries have data but fail to process or publish it in usable form. Analysis from a gender perspective is almost completely lacking.

More women today are migrating independently for work, though family reunification is still the main reason for female migration. An unknown but significant number of women are forced by war or civil unrest to leave their countries. Other reasons for women to migrate include unequal gender relations, gender-based violence, poverty and economic insecurity.

1. Collect, analyse and make available data on female migration, including flows of migrants and cyclical migration.
2. Discuss and agree on migration issues at all cross-national levels (bilateral, sub-regional, regional and international), including with countries of transit, taking advantage of international organisations and mechanisms for the purpose; issues include:
   - Policy frameworks to provide safety and stability to the process of migration, discourage irregular migration, and punish traffickers;
   - Enforcement of international conventions and agreements;
   - Pro flow of labour as well as goods and services;
   - Skills development of female migrants;
   - Portability of social security benefits;
   - Secure transfer of remittances and remuneration;
   - Employment of female migrants to housing, education, health, including reproductive health and other services;
   - Support for civil society organisations working with and on behalf of migrant women.
3. Support individual migrants:
   - Countries of origin should provide pre-departure programmes (in co-operation with migrant organisations in destination countries) including information and training for women considering migration on:
     - Conditions in the intended countries of destination;
     - Legal migration routes and the implications of irregular migration;
     - Human rights entitlements, including rights to basic services;
     - Where to find assistance in countries of transit and destination, including consular support, social migrant organisations and destination-city NGOs;
     - Protecting health, including reproductive health;
   - Job opportunities in countries of destination;
   - Destinations-country language;
   - Optimising remittances while abroad and on return.
4. Recognise and respond with services and information to specific gender-related issues:
   a. Enhanced risks of violence, theft and fraud;
   b. Trafficking and coercion, including forced marriage;
   c. Access to and capacity to use health and other services, including reproductive health services;
   d. Expectations related to the family;
   e. ‘Double burden’ for migrant women (stemming from e.g. discrimination, cultural restrictions and heightened exposure to risk);
   f. Isolation by reason of language or family situation.

Migration is not necessarily permanent: most refugees for example hope to return to their own countries.

More women today are migrating independently for work, though family reunification is still the main reason for female migration. An unknown but significant number of women are forced by war or civil unrest to leave their countries. Other reasons for women to migrate include unequal gender relations, gender-based violence, poverty and economic insecurity.

1. Collect, analyse and make available data on female migration, including flows of migrants and cyclical migration.
2. Discuss and agree on migration issues at all cross-national levels (bilateral, sub-regional, regional and international), including with countries of transit, taking advantage of international organisations and mechanisms for the purpose; issues include:
   - Policy frameworks to provide safety and stability to the process of migration, discourage irregular migration, and punish traffickers;
   - Enforcement of international conventions and agreements;
   - Pro flow of labour as well as goods and services;
   - Skills development of female migrants;
   - Portability of social security benefits;
   - Secure transfer of remittances and remuneration;
   - Employment of female migrants to housing, education, health, including reproductive health and other services;
   - Support for civil society organisations working with and on behalf of migrant women.
3. Support individual migrants:
   - Countries of origin should provide pre-departure programmes (in co-operation with migrant organisations in destination countries) including information and training for women considering migration on:
     - Conditions in the intended countries of destination;
     - Legal migration routes and the implications of irregular migration;
     - Human rights entitlements, including rights to basic services;
     - Where to find assistance in countries of transit and destination, including consular support, social migrant organisations and destination-city NGOs;
     - Protecting health, including reproductive health;
For women

- Migration can be empowering:
  - Migration can offer better education opportunities and access to health care, including reproductive health, for women and their children.
  - Migration can offer economic opportunities, increased financial independence and decision-making power.
  - Migration can permit women to escape conflict, personal violence, discrimination, cultural restrictions or oppressive gender roles, and in doing so assert greater autonomy over their lives.

For families, communities and governments in countries of origin

- Women in formal employment pay taxes and can contribute to social service funds.
- Women often fill gaps in the labour force in manufacturing, domestic and hotel work, and other unskilled jobs. The health and information and communication technologies sectors contribute to the socio-economic development of their countries.
- Remittances are the second largest capital flow to developing countries, nearly three times official development assistance, and as much as 10 per cent of GDP in some countries.

For families, communities and governments in the country of destination:

- Women often fill gaps in the labour force in manufacturing, domestic and hotel work, and other unskilled jobs. The health and information and communication technologies sectors contribute to the socio-economic development of their countries.
- Returning female migrants can bring with them valuable skills and experience to recruit qualified and graduate migrant women.
- Women in formal employment pay taxes and can contribute to social service funds.

At all stages of migration

- Women are at heightened risk for coercion, violence, theft and fraud.
- Young women are at greater risk, including for unwanted pregnancy and sexually transmitted infections.
- Female migrants' relatives lack of education and information compared with male migrants adds to their vulnerability.
- Countries would prefer not to lose qualified women and graduates. This is an increasingly high cost to many countries, some of them under coercion. Countries must address women's vulnerability.
- Women are at heightened risk for coercion, violence, theft and fraud.
- Extreme poverty, homelessness and destitution;
- Women subject to gender-based violence or abuse;
- Women working in the informal sector or in domestic employment not subject to the protection of labour laws;
- Women who are or become socially isolated, separated from their families and out of touch with their own communities;
- Women who are or become destitute.
- Women who are or become socially isolated, separated from their families and out of touch with their own communities;
- Women who are or become destitute.
- Women who are denied health and other services, including reproductive health services such as family planning, maternal health and protection from unwanted pregnancy and from HIV/AIDS and other sexually transmitted infections;
- Women who are or become socially isolated, separated from their families and out of touch with their own communities;
- Women who are or become destitute.
- Women who are denied health and other services, including reproductive health services such as family planning, maternal health and protection from unwanted pregnancy and from HIV/AIDS and other sexually transmitted infections;
- Women who are or become socially isolated, separated from their families and out of touch with their own communities;
- Women who are or become destitute.
- Women who are or become socially isolated, separated from their families and out of touch with their own communities;
- Women who are or become destitute.
- Women who are or become socially isolated, separated from their families and out of touch with their own communities;
- Women who are or become destitute.
- Women who are or become socially isolated, separated from their families and out of touch with their own communities;
- Women who are or become destitute.
- Women who travel as family members subject to cultural constraints;
- Women who are irregular or undocumented migrants.
- Women who are or become socially isolated, separated from their families and out of touch with their own communities;
- Women who are or become destitute.
- Women who are or become socially isolated, separated from their families and out of touch with their own communities;
- Women who are or become destitute.
- Women who are or become socially isolated, separated from their families and out of touch with their own communities;
- Women who are or become destitute.
- Women who are or become socially isolated, separated from their families and out of touch with their own communities;
- Women who are or become destitute.
- Women who are or become socially isolated, separated from their families and out of touch with their own communities;
- Women who are or become destitute.
- Women who are or become socially isolated, separated from their families and out of touch with their own communities;
- Women who are or become destitute.
- Women who are or become socially isolated, separated from their families and out of touch with their own communities;
- Women who are or become destitute.
- Women who are or become socially isolated, separated from their families and out of touch with their own communities;
- Women who are or become destitute.
- Women who are or become socially isolated, separated from their families and out of touch with their own communities;
- Women who are or become destitute.
- Women who are or become socially isolated, separated from their families and out of touch with their own communities;
- Women who are or become destitute.
- Women who are or become socially isolated, separated from their families and out of touch with their own communities;
- Women who are or become destitute.
- Women who are or become socially isolated, separated from their families and out of touch with their own communities;
- Women who are or become destitute.
- Women who are or become socially isolated, separated from their families and out of touch with their own communities;
- Women who are or become destitute.
- Women who are or become socially isolated, separated from their families and out of touch with their own communities;
- Women who are or become destitute.
- Women who are or become socially isolated, separated from their families and out of touch with their own communities;
- Women who are or become destitute.
- Women who are or become socially isolated, separated from their families and out of touch with their own communities;
- Women who are or become destitute.
- Women who are or become socially isolated, separated from their families and out of touch with their own communities;
- Women who are or become destitute.
- Women who are or become socially isolated, separated from their families and out of touch with their own communities;
- Women who are or become destitute.
- Women who are or become socially isolated, separated from their families and out of touch with their own communities;
- Women who are or become destitute.
- Women who are or become socially isolated, separated from their families and out of touch with their own communities;
- Women who are or become destitute.
- Women who are or become socially isolated, separated from their families and out of touch with their own communities;
- Women who are or become destitute.
- Women who are or become socially isolated, separated from their families and out of touch with their own communities;
- Women who are or become destitute.
- Women who are or become socially isolated, separated from their families and out of touch with their own communities;
- Women who are or become destitute.
- Women who are or become socially isolated, separated from their families and out of touch with their own communities;
- Women who are or become destitute.
- Women who are or become socially isolated, separated from their families and out of touch with their own communities;
- Women who are or become destitute.
- Women who are or become socially isolated, separated from their families and out of touch with their own communities;
- Women who are or become destitute.
- Women who are or become socially isolated, separated from their families and out of touch with their own communities;
- Women who are or become destitute.
- Women who are or become socially isolated, separated from their families and out of touch with their own communities;
- Women who are or become destitute.
For women
Migration can be empowering:
• Migration can offer better education opportunities and access to health care, including reproductive health, for women and their children.
• Migration can offer economic opportunities, increased financial independence and decision-making power.
• Migration can permit women to escape conflict, personal violence, discrimination, cultural restrictions or oppressive gender roles, and in doing so assert greater autonomy over their lives.

For families, communities and governments in countries of origin
• Women tend to remit more of their income than male migrants. Women use remittances to support family needs, such as food, clothing, housing, education and health.

For families, communities and governments in the country of destination:
• Women often fill gaps in the labour force in manufacturing, domestic and hotel work, and other unskilled jobs. The health and information and communication to female workers in these sectors recruit qualified and graduate migrant women.
• Women in formal employment pay taxes and can contribute to social service funds.
• Women often fill gaps in the labour force in manufacturing, domestic and hotel work, and other unskilled jobs. The health and information and communication to female workers in these sectors.
• Returning female migrants can bring with them valuable skills and experience to community leaders and advocates.

Individuals and communities will derive the most benefit from female migration by addressing obstacles, pitfalls and drawbacks.

At all stages of migration
• Women are at heightened risk for coercion, violence, theft and fraud.
• Young women are at greatest risk, including for unwanted pregnancy and sexually transmitted infections.
• Women are at heightened risk for coercion, violence, theft and fraud.
• Women who are or become destitute.
• Women who experience discrimination and denial of human rights in their country of destination.
• Women subject to gender-based violence or abuse.
• Women working in the informal sector or in domestic employment not subject to the protection of labour laws.
• Women who are or become socially isolated, separated from their families and out of touch with their own communities.
• Women without skills or qualifications, or whose skills or qualifications are not recognised.
• Women who are or become socially isolated, separated from their families and out of touch with their own communities.

Before departure
Countries must address women’s vulnerability
• To trafficking and forced migration for marriage.
• To fraudulently or misleadingly offers and contracts by unsupervised employment agents.

On return
Women returning to their home countries often bring with them a wealth of experience as well as material benefits. Many however experience the effects of:
• Disjunction from family and community.
• Lack of integration.
• Women migrating from developed to developing countries.
• Women migrating from developing to developing countries.

Realizing the Benefit
To discuss these issues, UNFPA and IOM organised an expert group meeting on 2-3 May 2006 entitled “Female migrants: bridging the gaps throughout the life-cycle”. The meeting brought together over 50 independent experts from countries of origin, transit and destination, as well as representatives from governments, international agencies, NGOs, and diaspora organisations. The aim was to formulate a set of recommendations for action by governments, international organisations and civil society, as a contribution to the High-Level Dialogue on International Migration and Development to mainstream female migrants’ needs and rights into the agenda.

Call for Action
To discuss these issues, UNFPA and IOM organised an expert group meeting on 2-3 May 2006 entitled “Female migrants: bridging the gaps throughout the life-cycle”. The meeting brought together over 50 independent experts from countries of origin, transit and destination, as well as representatives from governments, international agencies, NGOs, and diaspora organisations. The aim was to formulate a set of recommendations for action by governments, international organisations and civil society, as a contribution to the High-Level Dialogue on International Migration and Development to mainstream female migrants’ needs and rights into the agenda.

Why is the Linkage Between Migration and Gender Important?

Migration and Gender Important?

Individuals and communities will derive the most benefit from female migration by addressing obstacles, pitfalls and drawbacks.

At all stages of migration

• Women are at heightened risk for coercion, violence, theft and fraud.
• Young women are at greatest risk, including for unwanted pregnancy and sexually transmitted infections.
• Women are at heightened risk for coercion, violence, theft and fraud.
• Women who are or become destitute.
• Women who experience discrimination and denial of human rights in their country of destination.
• Women subject to gender-based violence or abuse.
• Women working in the informal sector or in domestic employment not subject to the protection of labour laws.
• Women who are or become socially isolated, separated from their families and out of touch with their own communities.
• Women without skills or qualifications, or whose skills or qualifications are not recognised.
• Women who are or become socially isolated, separated from their families and out of touch with their own communities.

Before departure
Countries must address women’s vulnerability
• To trafficking and forced migration for marriage.
• To fraudulently or misleadingly offers and contracts by unsupervised employment agents.

On return
Women returning to their home countries often bring with them a wealth of experience as well as material benefits. Many however experience the effects of:
• Disjunction from family and community.
• Lack of integration.
• Women migrating from developed to developing countries.
• Women migrating from developing to developing countries.
Migration can be empowering:

For women:
- Migration can offer economic opportunities, increased financial independence and decision-making power.
- Migration can permit women to escape conflict, personal violence, discrimination, cultural restrictions or oppressive gender roles, and in doing so assert greater autonomy over their lives.

For families, communities and governments in countries of origin:
- Women tend to remit more of their income than male migrants. Women use remittances to meet family needs, such as food, clothing, housing, education and health.
- Return female migrants can bring with them valuable skills and experience to contribute to the socio-economic development of their countries.

For families, communities and governments in the country of destination:
- Women often fill gaps in the labour force in manufacturing, domestic and hotel work, and other unskilled jobs. The health and information and communication to foreign sectors, recruit qualified and graduate migrant women.
- Women in formal employment pay taxes and can contribute to social service funds.
- Women often fill gaps in the labour force in manufacturing, domestic and hotel work, and other unskilled jobs. The health and information and communication to foreign sectors, recruit qualified and graduate migrant women.
- Women in formal employment pay taxes and can contribute to social service funds.
- Returning female migrants can bring with them valuable skills and experience to contribute to the socio-economic development of their countries.

Realizing the Benefit

At all stages of migration:
- Women are at heightened risk for coercion, violence, theft and fraud.
- Young women are at greater risk, including for unwanted pregnancy and sexually transmitted infections.
- Female migrants’ relative lack of education and information compared with male migrants add to their vulnerability.
- Countries would prefer to lose qualified women and graduates. This is an increasingly high cost to many developing countries and countries in transition. Countries lose not only the services of migrants but investments in their education and training. The cost is especially high in the donor sector, including for the countries most seriously affected by HIV/AIDS.

Before departure:
- Countries must address women’s vulnerability to trafficking and forced migration for marriage.
- To fraudulent or misleading offers and contracts by unscrupulous employment agents.

On transit:
- Countries of transit are hosts to considerable numbers of female migrants in passage to third countries, some of them under coercion. Countries must ensure that women migrants in transit are not subject to discrimination and denial of their rights.

The countries of destination:
- Women who are or become destitute.
- Women who are denied health and other services, including reproductive health services such as family planning, maternal health and protection from unwanted pregnancy, and from HIV/AIDS and other sexually-transmitted infections.
- Women who travel as family members subject to cultural constraints.
- Women who are or become socially isolated, separated from their families and out of touch with their own communities.
- Women without skills or qualifications, or whose skills or qualifications are not recognized.
- Women who experience discrimination and denial of human rights in their country of destination.
- Women who are or become economically isolated, separated from their families and out of touch with their communities.

Return:
- Countries of origin may find women migrants a valuable addition to their work force and society, but tensions can arise from:
  - Women in informal sector or in domestic employment not subject to the protection of labor laws.
  - Women who are or become socially isolated, separated from their families and out of touch with their communities.
  - Women who are or become economically isolated, separated from their families and out of touch with their communities.
  - Women who experience discrimination and denial of human rights in their country of destination.
  - Women who are or become destitute.

At every stage of migration:
- Women are at heightened risk for coercion, violence, theft and fraud.
- Young women are at greater risk, including for unwanted pregnancy and sexually transmitted infections.
- Countries would prefer to lose qualified women and graduates. This is an increasingly high cost to many developing countries and countries in transition. Countries lose not only the services of migrants but investments in their education and training. The cost is especially high in the donor sector, including for the countries most seriously affected by HIV/AIDS.

Individuals and countries will derive the most benefit from female migration by addressing obstacles, pitfalls and drawbacks.

At all stages of migration:
- Women are at heightened risk for coercion, violence, theft and fraud.
- Young women are at greatest risk, including for unwanted pregnancy and sexually transmitted infections.
- Female migrants’ relative lack of education and information compared with male migrants add to their vulnerability.
- Countries would prefer not to lose qualified women and graduates. This is an increasingly high cost to many developing countries and countries in transition. Countries lose not only the services of migrants but investments in their education and training. The cost is especially high in the donor sector, including for the countries most seriously affected by HIV/AIDS.

Individuals and countries will derive the most benefit from female migration by addressing obstacles, pitfalls and drawbacks.

At all stages of migration:
- Women are at heightened risk for coercion, violence, theft and fraud.
- Young women are at greatest risk, including for unwanted pregnancy and sexually transmitted infections.
- Female migrants’ relative lack of education and information compared with male migrants add to their vulnerability.
- Countries would prefer not to lose qualified women and graduates. This is an increasingly high cost to many developing countries and countries in transition. Countries lose not only the services of migrants but investments in their education and training. The cost is especially high in the donor sector, including for the countries most seriously affected by HIV/AIDS.

Individuals and countries will derive the most benefit from female migration by addressing obstacles, pitfalls and drawbacks.

At all stages of migration:
- Women are at heightened risk for coercion, violence, theft and fraud.
- Young women are at greatest risk, including for unwanted pregnancy and sexually transmitted infections.
- Female migrants’ relative lack of education and information compared with male migrants add to their vulnerability.
- Countries would prefer not to lose qualified women and graduates. This is an increasingly high cost to many developing countries and countries in transition. Countries lose not only the services of migrants but investments in their education and training. The cost is especially high in the donor sector, including for the countries most seriously affected by HIV/AIDS.

Individuals and countries will derive the most benefit from female migration by addressing obstacles, pitfalls and drawbacks.

At all stages of migration:
- Women are at heightened risk for coercion, violence, theft and fraud.
- Young women are at greatest risk, including for unwanted pregnancy and sexually transmitted infections.
- Female migrants’ relative lack of education and information compared with male migrants add to their vulnerability.
- Countries would prefer not to lose qualified women and graduates. This is an increasingly high cost to many developing countries and countries in transition. Countries lose not only the services of migrants but investments in their education and training. The cost is especially high in the donor sector, including for the countries most seriously affected by HIV/AIDS.

Individuals and countries will derive the most benefit from female migration by addressing obstacles, pitfalls and drawbacks.

At all stages of migration:
- Women are at heightened risk for coercion, violence, theft and fraud.
- Young women are at greatest risk, including for unwanted pregnancy and sexually transmitted infections.
- Female migrants’ relative lack of education and information compared with male migrants add to their vulnerability.
- Countries would prefer not to lose qualified women and graduates. This is an increasingly high cost to many developing countries and countries in transition. Countries lose not only the services of migrants but investments in their education and training. The cost is especially high in the donor sector, including for the countries most seriously affected by HIV/AIDS.

Individuals and countries will derive the most benefit from female migration by addressing obstacles, pitfalls and drawbacks.

At all stages of migration:
- Women are at heightened risk for coercion, violence, theft and fraud.
- Young women are at greatest risk, including for unwanted pregnancy and sexually transmitted infections.
- Female migrants’ relative lack of education and information compared with male migrants add to their vulnerability.
- Countries would prefer not to lose qualified women and graduates. This is an increasingly high cost to many developing countries and countries in transition. Countries lose not only the services of migrants but investments in their education and training. The cost is especially high in the donor sector, including for the countries most seriously affected by HIV/AIDS.

Individuals and countries will derive the most benefit from female migration by addressing obstacles, pitfalls and drawbacks.

At all stages of migration:
- Women are at heightened risk for coercion, violence, theft and fraud.
- Young women are at greatest risk, including for unwanted pregnancy and sexually transmitted infections.
- Female migrants’ relative lack of education and information compared with male migrants add to their vulnerability.
- Countries would prefer not to lose qualified women and graduates. This is an increasingly high cost to many developing countries and countries in transition. Countries lose not only the services of migrants but investments in their education and training. The cost is especially high in the donor sector, including for the countries most seriously affected by HIV/AIDS.

Individuals and countries will derive the most benefit from female migration by addressing obstacles, pitfalls and drawbacks.
For women

Migration can be empowering:

• Migration can offer better education opportunities and access to health care, including reproductive health, for women and their children.

• Migration can offer economic opportunities, increased financial independence and decision-making power.

• Migration can permit women to escape conflict, personal violence, discrimination, cultural restrictions or oppressive gender roles, and in doing so assert greater autonomy over their lives.

For families, communities and governments in countries of origin:

• Countries must address women’s vulnerability to trafficking and forced migration for marriage.

• To fraudulently or misleadingly offer contracts by unscrupulous employment agents.

The transit:

Countries of transit are often located in some of the most impoverished countries in the world, with a high prevalence of HIV/AIDS. They may be at risk of becoming transit points for female migrants trafficked or coerced for forced marriage.

At all stages of migration:

• Women are at heightened risk for coercion, violence, theft and fraud.

• Young women are at greater risk, including for unwanted pregnancy and sexually transmitted infections.

• Women can be at risk for HIV/AIDS and other sexually-transmitted infections.

• Female migrants’ relative lack of education and information compared with male migrants adds to their vulnerability.

• Women who are or become destitute.

• Women who are or become socially isolated, separated from their families and out of touch with their own communities.

• Women who are or become unemployed.

• Women who travel as family members subject to cultural constraints.

• Women who are or become socially isolated, separated from their families and out of touch with their own communities.

• Women who are or become socially isolated, separated from their families and out of touch with their own communities.

• Women who are or become socially isolated, separated from their families and out of touch with their own communities.

Realizing the Benefit

Individuals and countries will derive the most benefit from female migration by addressing obstacles, pitfalls and drawbacks.

At every stage of migration:

• Countries would prefer not to lose qualified women and graduates.

• Female migrants' relative lack of education and information compared with male migrants adds to their vulnerability.

• Countries must address women’s vulnerability to trafficking and forced migration for marriage.

• To fraudulently or misleadingly offer contracts by unscrupulous employment agents.

To call for action:

To discuss these issues, UNFPA and IOM organized an expert group meeting on 2-3 May 2006 entitled “Female migrants: bridging the gaps throughout the life-cycle.” The meeting brought together over 50 independent experts from countries of origin, transit and destination, as well as representatives from governments, international agencies, NGOs, and diaspora organizations. The aim was to formulate a set of recommendations for action by governments, international organizations and civil society as a contribution to the High-Level Dialogue on International Migration and Development to mainstream female migrants’ needs and rights into the agenda.
1. Collect, analyse and make available data on female migration, including flows of migrants and cyclical migration.

2. Discuss analogues on migration issues at all cross-national levels (bilateral, sub-regional, regional and international), including with countries of transit, taking advantage of international organisations and mechanisms for the purpose; hence include:
   a. Policy frameworks to provide safety and stability to the process of migration; discourage irregular migration and combat trafficking;
   b. Enforcement of international conventions and agreements; a free flow of labour as well as of goods and services;
   c. Skills development of female migrants;
   d. Portability of social security benefits;
   e. Social security for migrants and dependants;
   f. Employment of female migrants in health, education, including reproductive health and other services;
   g. Support for civil society organisations working with and on behalf of migrant women.

3. Support individual migrants:
   a. Countries of origin should provide pre-departure programmes (in co-operation with migrant organisations in destination countries) including information and training for women considering migration on:
      • Conditions in the intended countries of destination;
      • Legal migration routes and the implications of irregular migration;
      • Human rights entitlements, including rights to basic services;
      • Where to find assistance in countries of transit and destination, including consular support, social migrant organisations and destination-country NGOs;
      • Promoting health, including reproductive health;
      • Job opportunities in countries of destination;
      • Destinations-county languages;
      • Optimising remittances while abroad and on return. Special care is needed to combat stigma against returned women of trafficking and abuse, and women living with HIV/AIDS;
      • Countries of transit should ensure respect for human rights, protection for migrants in transit and prevention of coercion and trafficking;
      • Countries of destination should ensure respect for migrant human rights, equal treatment under the law, and access to employment, housing, education, health, including reproductive health, family planning, material health, etc.; and other services on the same basis as citizens. Special attention is needed to prevent women’s social isolation and promote family reunification;
      • Irregular migrants should have due protection for their human rights.

4. Recognise and respond with services and information to specific gender-related issues:
   a. Enhanced risks of violence, abuse and fraud;
   b. Trafficking and coercion, including forced marriage;
   c. Access to and capacity to use health and other services, including reproductive health services;
   d. Expectations related to the family;
   e. “Double burden” for migrant women (stemming from e.g. discrimination, cultural restrictions and heightened exposure to risk);
   f. Isolation by reason of language or family situation.

5. Include migration in national and international gender-related policies and strategies.

6. Engage in and support gender-responsive research and analysis.

7. Engage women and men, especially youth, in decision making on migration issues.

8. Promote gender-responsive evaluation and reporting on the impact of policies and programmes.

9. Support civil society organisations working with and on behalf of migrant women.

10. Support women who migrate for work may do so without fear, and families may return to their homelands at the end of their working lives. But there is little reliable information on flows as opposed to stocks of female migrants or about the numbers and frequency of cyclical migration.

11. Women who migrate for work may do so without fear, and families may return to their homelands at the end of their working lives. But there is little reliable information on flows as opposed to stocks of female migrants or about the numbers and frequency of cyclical migration.

12. Migration is not necessarily permanent; most refugees for example hope to return to their own countries.

13. Facts and Figures

   Over the past 40 years, there has been a steady increase in female migration. Of the approximately 191 million migrants in 2005, around 95 million were female, of which an estimated 60 million were in developed countries.

   More women today are migrating independently for work, though family reunification is still the main reason for female migration. An unknown but significant number of women are forced by war or civil unrest to leave their countries. Other reasons for women to migrate include unequal gender relations, gender-based violence, poverty and economic insecurity.

   • Job opportunities in countries of destination;
   • Destinations-country language;
   • Optimising remittances while abroad and on return.

   Countries of origin should provide support as necessary for their citizens before departure, during their stay overseas and on return. Special care is needed to combat stigma against returned women of trafficking and abuse, and women living with HIV/AIDS.

   Countries of transit should ensure respect for human rights, protection for migrants in transit and prevention of coercion and trafficking.

   Countries of destination should ensure respect for migrant human rights, equal treatment under the law, and access to employment, housing, education, health, including reproductive health, family planning, material health, etc.; and other services on the same basis as citizens. Special attention is needed to prevent women’s social isolation and promote family reunification.

   Irregular migrants should have due protection for their human rights.

   Migrants and returned women may need services and information to specific gender-related issues:

   Enhanced risks of violence, abuse and fraud;
   Trafficking and coercion, including forced marriage;
   Access to and capacity to use health and other services, including reproductive health services;
   Expectations related to the family;
   “Double burden” for migrant women (stemming from e.g. discrimination, cultural restrictions and heightened exposure to risk);
   Isolation by reason of language or family situation.

   1. Collect, analyse and make available data on female migration, including flows of migrants and cyclical migration.

   2. Discuss analogues on migration issues at all cross-national levels (bilateral, sub-regional, regional and international), including with countries of transit, taking advantage of international organisations and mechanisms for the purpose; hence include:

   a. Policy frameworks to provide safety and stability to the process of migration; discourage irregular migration and combat trafficking;
   b. Enforcement of international conventions and agreements; a free flow of labour as well as of goods and services;
   c. Skills development of female migrants;
   d. Portability of social security benefits;
   e. Social security for migrants and dependants;
   f. Employment of female migrants in health, education, including reproductive health and other services;
   g. Support for civil society organisations working with and on behalf of migrant women.

   3. Support individual migrants:

   a. Countries of origin should provide pre-departure programmes (in co-operation with migrant organisations in destination countries) including information and training for women considering migration on:

   • Conditions in the intended countries of destination;
   • Legal migration routes and the implications of irregular migration;
   • Human rights entitlements, including rights to basic services;
   • Where to find assistance in countries of transit and destination, including consular support, social migrant organisations and destination-country NGOs;
   • Promoting health, including reproductive health;
   • Job opportunities in countries of destination;
   • Destinations-country language;
   • Optimising remittances while abroad and on return.

   Countries of origin should provide support as necessary for their citizens before departure, during their stay overseas and on return. Special care is needed to combat stigma against returned women of trafficking and abuse, and women living with HIV/AIDS.

   Countries of transit should ensure respect for human rights, protection for migrants in transit and prevention of coercion and trafficking.

   Countries of destination should ensure respect for migrant human rights, equal treatment under the law, and access to employment, housing, education, health, including reproductive health, family planning, material health, etc.; and other services on the same basis as citizens. Special attention is needed to prevent women’s social isolation and promote family reunification.

   Irregular migrants should have due protection for their human rights.

   4. Recognise and respond with services and information to specific gender-related issues:

   a. Enhanced risks of violence, abuse and fraud;
   b. Trafficking and coercion, including forced marriage;
   c. Access to and capacity to use health and other services, including reproductive health services;
   d. Expectations related to the family;
   e. “Double burden” for migrant women (stemming from e.g. discrimination, cultural restrictions and heightened exposure to risk);
   f. Isolation by reason of language or family situation.

   5. Include migration in national and international gender-related policies and strategies.

   6. Engage in and support gender-responsive research and analysis.

   7. Engage women and men, especially youth, in decision making on migration issues.

   8. Promote gender-responsive evaluation and reporting on the impact of policies and programmes.

   9. Support civil society organisations working with and on behalf of migrant women.

   10. Support women who migrate for work may do so without fear, and families may return to their homelands at the end of their working lives. But there is little reliable information on flows as opposed to stocks of female migrants or about the numbers and frequency of cyclical migration.

   Migration is not necessarily permanent; most refugees for example hope to return to their own countries;
Over the past 40 years, there has been a steady increase in female migration. Of the approximately 191 million migrants in 2005, around 95 million were female, of which an estimated 60 million were in developed countries.

- Job opportunities in countries of destination;
- Destinational-country language;
- Optimising remittances while abroad and on return;
- Concerns of origin should provide support as necessary for their citizens before departure, during their stay overseas and on return. Special care is needed to combat stigma against returned women and men, and women living with HIV/AIDS;
- Concerns of origin should ensure respect for human rights, protection for migrants in transit and prevention of coerced and trafficking;
- Concerns of destination should ensure respect for migrant human rights, equal treatment under the law, and access to employment, housing, education, culture, health, including reproductive health, family planning, material health, etc.; and other services on the same basis as citizens. Special attention is needed to prevent women's social isolation and promote family reunification;
- Irregular migrants should have due protection for their human rights;
- Migrations and trends with services and information to specific gender-related issues:
  - Enhanced risks of violence, abuse and fraud;
  - Trafficking and coercion, including forced marriage;
  - Access to and capacity to use health and other services, including reproductive health services;
  - Expectations related to the family;
  - “Double burden” for migrant women (stemming from e.g. discrimination, cultural restrictions and heightened exposure to risk);
  - Isolation by reason of language or family situation.

More women today are migrating independently for work, though family reunification is still the main reason for female migration. An unknown but significant number of women are forced by war or civil unrest to leave their countries. Other reasons for women to migrate include unequal gender relations, gender-based violence, poverty and economic insecurity.

Data on female migration are generally inadequate. Many countries do not data to process or publish it in usable form. Analysis from a gender perspective is almost completely lacking.

Women on the Move

Migration is not necessarily permanent: most refugees for example hope to return to their own countries;

1. Collect, analyse and make available data on female migration, including flows of migrants and cyclical migration.
2. Discuss analyses on migration issues at all cross-national levels (bilateral, sub-regional, regional and international), including with countries of origin, taking advantage of international organisations and mechanisms for the purpose, hence include:
   - Policy frameworks to provide safety and stability to the process of migration. Discuss irregular migrants, and combat trafficking;
   - Enforcement of international conventions and agreements;
   - Free flow of labour as well as goods and services;
   - Skills development of female migrants;
   - Portability of social security benefits;
   - Support for civil society organisations working with and on behalf of migrant women.

3. Support individual migrants:
   - Countries of origin should provide pre-departure programmes (in co-operation with migrant organisations in destination countries) including information and training for women considering migration on:
     - Conditions in the intended countries of destination;
     - Legal migration routes and the implications of irregular migration;
     - Human rights entitlements, including rights to basic services;
     - Where to find assistance in countries of transit and destination, including consular support, social migrant organisations and destination-country NGOs;
     - Protecting health, including reproductive health;

United Nations Population Fund
220 East 42nd Street
New York, New York 10017
www.unfpa.org

International Organization for Migration
17, Route des Morillons
CH-1211 Geneva 19 Switzerland
Tel: +41.22.717 9111 • Fax: +41.22.798 6150
122 East 42nd Street, New York, NY 10168-1610
www.iom.int

Facts and Figures

Over the past 40 years, there has been a steady increase in female migration. Of the approximately 191 million migrants in 2005, around 95 million were female, of which an estimated 60 million were in developed countries.

More women today are migrating independently for work, though family reunification is still the main reason for female migration. An unknown but significant number of women are forced by war or civil unrest to leave their countries. Other reasons for women to migrate include unequal gender relations, gender-based violence, poverty and economic insecurity.

Women who migrate for work may do so out of necessity, and families may return to their homelands at the end of their working lives. But there is little reliable information on flows as opposed to stocks of female migrants or about the numbers and frequency of cyclical migration.

Data on female migration are generally inadequate. Many countries do not data to process or publish it in usable form. Analysis from a gender perspective is almost completely lacking.